

more irritating mercurial ointment, by Brodie's well-known method, being spread upon a flannel belly-band, or it may be alternated between the soft skin in the flexures of the axilla, elbow, and knee. The quantity should be decreased as soon as the symptoms begin to yield, and the inunctions continued for many months after the disappearance of all symptoms. Gray powder is largely used in infantile syphilis, in doses of the fraction of a grain, but there is every objection to internal treatment, as being uncertain in dose (even a healthy infant constantly regurgitates and vomits), and liable to irritate. There is no conceivable objection to inunction, even if the body were one vast ulcerated mucous patch. The extra care required for the inunction would have to be given to the child in any case. If the infant survives a few months, iodide of potassium may be administered through its nurse. Locally the sores require only cleanliness, with (in special cases) some ointment or dusting with calomel and iodoform.
